In almost every part of our lives, whether it's banking, transport, travel or maintaining social or business connections, technology has changed the way we do things. Just as people expect technology to seamlessly support them in their everyday lives, both consumers and healthcare professionals expect digital technology to support the delivery of high-quality healthcare.

What is interoperability?

Australia's National Digital Health Strategy describes interoperability as follows.

At its simplest, it is the ability to move information easily between people, organisations and systems. It is imperative that when information is shared between people and systems, its meaning is preserved from one context to another so that information is interpreted in the same way.

As part of the national interoperability consultation – Better connections: Your health, your say – The Australian Digital Health Agency is hosting a workshop to hear your perspectives on the future of digital health in Australia and how it can best support delivery of modern person-centred health services and empower personal wellbeing.

We hope you will join us for this important discussion. If you cannot attend but would like to be involved in the conversation, you can have your say via the Better connections: Your health, your say survey online.

If you are available to attend, please RSVP here, indicating any dietary requirements. I look forward to your participation in this key event. If you have any questions, please contact yoursay@digitalhealth.gov.au.
